Sociology

UNDERGRADUATE GUIDE

MA Sociology

Sociology is the study of modern societies. It examines how societies work, how they are changing, and how individuals are affected in multiple ways by social change. Sociology allows students to understand the world around them in ways that are both novel and critical.

Why Study Sociology at Aberdeen?

Sociology at Aberdeen is widely regarded as one of the best sociology departments in the UK. In the last onsite review by the Scottish Higher Education Funding Council, we were judged to be 'Excellent' (the highest grade possible) in its Teaching Quality Assessment (TQA) exercise. We also consistently achieve very high rankings for undergraduate teaching quality in various guides for students and parents.

We are strongly committed to providing students with outstandingly good teaching, through a range of engaging courses on many areas of contemporary social importance.

Sociology at Aberdeen is also recognized by the UK government's Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) as an outlet for providing top quality research training and supervision for postgraduate Masters and PhD students.

Sociology at Aberdeen has many leading scholars who are internationally recognized experts in their fields. The department is particularly well known for its work in the areas of the sociology of conflict and peace processes; policing; globalization; religion; political and economic sociology; European societies; social inequalities; animal-human relations.

Publication of the results of the UK Government's 2021 Research Excellence Framework (REF) confirmed the status of Sociology as one of the leading research units in the field in the UK. With more than 78% of the research judged by a panel of experts to be world-leading (4*) or internationally excellent (3*) and all of its work meeting national standards of excellence. The department was also ranked as one of the top two sociology units in Scotland.

Aberdeen is, in every way, a great place to study the fascinating and highly relevant subject of Sociology.

Degree Structure & Content

In the Aberdeen undergraduate degree there are two initial years of study before you specialize: In both first year and second year, you take various different subjects. Alongside your Sociology courses, you can take almost any subject in the Arts & Social Sciences.

In the third and fourth years you have the option to follow a single Honours degree or study Sociology as part of a Joint Honours degree, including the recently added joint MA Criminology and Society, giving you the flexibility to shape your degree to suit your particular interests and career plans.

First & Second Year

The four-year degree enables students to understand their chosen subjects in-depth. In first year, sociology courses explore the relationships between individuals on the one hand and social forces and institutions on the other. We also examine the character of societies in the present day. We examine a range of key topics, including issues such as self-identity and group behaviour, deviance, consumerism, urbanization, crime, modern organizations, religion, mass media, surveillance, education, social inequalities, and gender.

In second year, we examine the nature of modern societies in more detail and we consider what special insights sociology can give us about them. We look both at microsociology – the study of people in small groups and in everyday life – and macrosociology – the study of largescale social forces and institutions, often worldwide in scope, that can affect whole societies and all the individuals who live within them.

At Aberdeen, you can take Sociology as a single degree or in a variety of joint degrees, including the recently added joint MA Criminology and Sociology.

Third & Fourth Year

Third year consists of courses in Social Theory, Modernization, Ten Sociological Studies, and Social Research Methods. The Methods course prepares students to pursue their own research topic in fourth year. In the final year, you choose option courses from a broad range of staff specialisms, exploring major sociological themes in-depth and addressing some of the key issues confronting contemporary societies.

Our Honours courses typically include:

- Animals and Society
- Contemporary Perspectives on Race and Ethnicity
- European Societies
- Gendered Approaches to Conflict and Societies
- Political Sociology
- Sex, Death and the Afterlife
- Sexualities and Gender Diversity
- Social Inequality
- Sociology of Religion and Culture

Meet your Lecturer

My name is Isabella Kasselstrand and I am a lecturer in the Sociology Department at the University of Aberdeen.

I love teaching Sociology – the scientific study of social relationships and patterns – and especially research methods and statistics. I am a firm believer that anyone can learn to analyse and interpret social science data proficiently – and even enjoy it! Such skills make sociology graduates of the University of Aberdeen highly marketable in various professions.

I use statistical methods in my own research on social change, primarily on patterns of religious decline around the world.

The programmes allow you to develop not only intellectually but also personally. It's a huge strength that a degree can make you grow as a person. I would definitely recommend it.

MIE ASTRUP JENSEN 2019

MA Criminology and Sociology

Criminology is the study of crime, law, and criminal justice. This new interdisciplinary programme combines dedicated Criminology modules with modules from Sociology, Psychology and Law to provide a broadly based and comprehensive Criminology and Sociology joint honours undergraduate degree.

Why study Criminology and Sociology at Aberdeen?

This multidisciplinary degree programme is delivered by the School of Social Sciences in partnership with the School of Psychology and the School of Law to offer a comprehensive understanding of the social, psychological and legal aspects of crime. Students will gain a range of sound theoretical, methodological and analytical skills, which will be applied in an independent research project in the final year.

Degree Structure & Content

You will study the theory and methods of criminology and apply your theoretical understanding of crime to investigate real-world problems such as victimisation, domestic violence, youth crime, public disorder, environmental harms, and cyber-crime.

You will also explore how technological advances are affecting crime and crime detection, including surveillance, facial recognition technologies and forensic psychology.

I found space for all my interests - gender, sexuality, religion, social inequalities, modern history. In many ways, it really was like finding a home.

NEREA HERAS 2019

Meet your Lecturer

Hi, my name is Karen Lumsden and I'm a lecturer in the Sociology Department at the University of Aberdeen.

As a criminologist I'm passionate about the sociological study of crime, deviance and victimisation and I'm keen to introduce students to the 'criminological imagination'.

I enjoy teaching introductory criminology lectures in which we explore theories and explanations of offending and criminal behaviour, the lived experiences of victims, technological crime such as cyber crime, and broader social harms such as climate change and the crimes of the powerful. We also explore the relationship between crime and social inequalities. My own research explores interpersonal cyber-crime such as online hate and trolling, and policing in the UK.

Careers and Skills

The Department ensures that its graduates have excellent knowledge of sociology and the ability and imagination to apply this information to real-life situations. Our courses provide considerable insight into the workings of modern societies and into the behaviour of people in social groups.

Our graduates acquire essential skills to prepare them for challenging professional roles, including how to conduct research and evaluate the research of others, critical enquiry skills, clear communication, good presentation, and independence of judgment.

Careers

Sociology and Criminology complement other disciplines such as Psychology, Politics, International Relations, Anthropology, Law, History, English, and many others. The interdisciplinary nature of the subject area, along with the extensive skillset and knowledge developed over the course of study, mean graduates are excellently qualified for entry into a range of career options.

Sociology graduates can be found in areas such as management (including HR), national and local government, media and journalism, advertising and marketing, teaching, as well as NGOs and social and community services, amongst many others. Graduates of Criminology and Sociology can see themselves in careers within public policy fields in all sectors (public, voluntary, and private), as well as more specifically within criminal justice organisations.

Recent graduate destinations include:

- Analyst
- Associate researcher
- Health and safety specialist
- Policy officer
- Student engagement and wellbeing coordinator
- Support practitioner
- Teacher
- Well-being coordinator
